ISOLATION

Isolation fosters creativity is a womenswear collection that is inspired by my own personal experience as a student during the Covid-19 Pandemic. It aims to shed light on various elements of the pandemic, including vaccinations, and safe distance signage; PPE safety measure, my own personal need for more appropriate 'work from home wear' as well as more creative dress that made me feel more positive in a time of extreme negativity. And after a time of such high product consumption, I also wanted my project to include emphasis on the need for sustainable practices like up cycling and re-making. The majority of my collection is made up of old garments that would otherwise have gone to landfill with the occasional new fabric included to mix old with new.

'Businesses are rethinking the supply chains and processes through which clothing gets made, as well as shifting sales to e-commerce platforms; focusing on what's now known as "work-from-home" wear...a category of merchandise that never existed before and is going to persist for quite a while'

Mind your hands

'As businesses and people attempt to put in place measures to protect themselves, their staff and their customers from the COVID-19 virus, the installation of plastic screens has sky rocketed. It seems nearly every shop, restaurant, bar and office now has some form of new plastic screen installed.'

These days all I seem to do is write and crochet. Makes sense being that they are the only things that bring me any mental peace. My wrist hurts.
