Tragic end for girl who tried to be a man

LIFE has ended tragically for Pat Barry, the woman who wanted desperately to be a man. Pat, 41, who wore pin-striped suits, smoked cigars, drank pints and even "married" a woman, was found dead in her bedsitter on Friday, the victim of a drug overdose.

By her side was a last letter to her "bride" of two years, Pauline Jenkins.

years during the 1970s. Though no longer identifying as a transsexual, Leslie still identifies as transgendered. As such, Leslie has experienced not only the same oppression that gay men, lesbians and other gender non-conformists generally experience from mainstream society, but has likewise experienced oppression within the gay and lesbian community itself because of being transgendered. Referring to her oppression, she has stated: "Being gay before Stonewall, it never occurred to me that the movement that would develop from the of Jess Gossberg, who grows up differently gendered in the blue collar industrial towns of the 1950s and 1960s. Left without a job or community in the 1970s, she decides to live as a man in order to survive, but eventually learns to accept the complexities of living as a transgendered person in a world that demands gender conformity.

The following interview with Leslie Feinberg was conducted during her visit to Kansas City, Missouri on Thursday, 24 June 1993:

The Life and Times of a Gender Outlaw:

by Davina Anne Gabriel

Davina: You were born a woman, and you identify as a woman, but you also identify as transgendered, which indicates to me that you have a broader definition of transgendered than do most people. So, exactly how do you define the term "transgendered?"

Leslie: I think that the mass movement will shape the definition of the word "transgendered." I see the transgender community in a world that defines men as masculine and women as feminine, the two sexes polar opposites, the two genders assigned, I see all of us who fall in between that -- transsexuals, transvestites, androgynes, people who are intersexed, drag queens, drag kings, female illusionists -- I would define as transgender.

Davina: So you would consider anyone who crosses established gender boundaries to be transgendered?

Leslie: I think the point is not whether I would, but whether they would. What I think is that the gender community is forming a movement and starting to be visible and that more and more people will decide whether they are or are not gender oppressed.

Davina: Do you consider someone who passes as the opposite sex for purely economic reasons and not for reasons of self-expression to be transgendered?

Leslie: I think that the passing population is by virtue of its definition an underground population, and rendered invisible because of oppression. So it's very hard to exactly sort out all of the conditions that make people pass. I think that if we'd examine the lives of a lot of other passing people we'd, first of all, find that there were very strong gender reasons why they even could pass, even if they would describe it as solely for economic or social reasons. Not everyone who goes through economic or social oppression can pass as the other sex. And I
